

Hitler's "Mass Suggestion"

Description

The mass meeting is necessary if only for the reason that in it the individual, who is becoming an adherent of a new movement feels lonely and is easily seized with the fear of being alone, receives for the first time the pictures of a greater community, something that has a strengthening and encouraging effect on most people.... If he steps for the first time out of his small workshop or out of the big enterprise, in which he feels very small, into the mass meeting and is now surrounded by thousands and thousands of people with the same conviction ... he himself succumbs to the magic influence of what we call mass suggestion...

(Adolf Hitler, from Mein Kampf)

Hitler on "social Darwinism":

Hitler had gotten into the habit of throwing pieces of bread or hard crusts to the little mice which spent their time in the small room, and then of watching these droll little animals romp and scuffle for these few delicacies." (Mein Kampf)

Category

1. History
2. Neuropolitics
3. Politics
4. Psychopolitics
5. Social psychology
6. Sociology

Tags

1. conformity
2. Hitler
3. Mass psychology
4. suggestibility

Date Created

25. December 2018

Author

web45